

THE CUBAN EMBARGO AND HUMAN RIGHTS

Intercultural Human Rights Law Review Annual Symposium

October 24, 2008

THE DEAN'S WELCOME ADDRESS

DEAN GARCIA *

Thank you very much, Yara Lorenzo. I want to again reiterate my thanks to Professor Siegfried Wiessner. Slava Borshchukov, Yara Lorenzo, and all the members of the Intercultural Human Rights Law Review. I know how hard you have worked on putting together this wonderful symposium. This symposium is especially dear to my heart because I came to the States in 1962, the year that the embargo was imposed, as a Cuban immigrant. I think you will enjoy these panels. Indeed, it is a diverse set of panels that will explore every facet of the Cuban Embargo, from the historical, socio-economic and legal aspects of the Embargo, as well as offering predictions and recommendations for the future.

I also want to reiterate what Monsignor Casale briefly mentioned in his welcoming remarks, and that is his emphasis on our wonderful program in Intercultural Human Rights. I have been privileged to teach in that program since its inception in 2001, and I am proud to say there have been over 260 students enrolled in the program since its inception, from over 50 different countries of the world. I think that is remarkable given the fact that we are less than 25 years old.

I also am very pleased that we have the foremost authority in international law here with us, Professor Michael Reisman. On a personal note, I missed probably one of the best educational opportunities in my career, when I was in my last year of law school at the University of Florida because Professor Reisman was a visiting professor at the time. Somehow the schedule did not permit me to take International Law with Professor Reisman in that semester and my best friend, who was enrolled in the course, told me I had missed a great course.

But I was very privileged, since he is the Myres McDougal Professor of International Law at Yale, to meet Myres McDougal, who was a remarkable individual, one of the best minds that I ever had the privilege of encountering. And I will never forget my conversation with Professor McDougal and speaking with him about the great political theorist Harold Lasswell, who formed a great bond with Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, and having a pleasant and intellectually stimulating conversation with Professor McDougal at Dean Hunt's house at the time. So we are very happy to have you here, Professor. I must apologize in advance for not being here to witness your receiving the Human Rights Award because I have another commitment with the Florida Board of Bar Examiners tonight that I have to attend. So, in advance, I apologize. You are richly deserving of that award.

With that, welcome, and I am sure you will enjoy the stimulating panels that have been put together today. Thank you very much.
