PROFESSIONALISM IN LAW SCHOOL

As has been pointed out to all law students since Orientation, the day you walked into law school was the day on which you began to embark on the road to becoming a professional: a lawyer. Your behavior in law school is subject to close scrutiny by the various state bars in deciding whether you meet the character and fitness requirements for admission to the bar. Certainly, admission to the bar can, and should, motivate “professional” behavior.

But maybe more important in the short term, is that you should exercise the discretion and judgment of a “professional” with regard to your colleagues, professors, and the law school and University administration. Here are some tips I hope you will keep in mind.

Classroom behavior, decorum, and how you interact with your colleagues and professors are paramount in whether you are perceived as acting “professionally.” Students should arrive on time and be prepared for class. Students should RSVP for events when asked to do so and should show up when they have indicated they would do so. It is inconsiderate to your colleagues and professors to arrive late, disrupt class, and then not be prepared when called upon. Studying the law is a dynamic process. It works best when the students and professor are prepared, knowledgeable, and engaged. Do your part to make the class experience meaningful and worthwhile for both you and your colleagues.

How you act in class directly reflects upon the perception you create to your peers and your professors. If at some point in the future your peers or professors are asked what they think about you (by prospective employers for example) that perception will be based largely upon the evidence of your competency, preparedness, and work ethics as demonstrated in class. You likely have already formed an opinion of whether you would “recommend” or “trust” individual classmates.

We all encounter frustrations day-to-day in dealing with other people and bureaucratic systems. The university and law school both have a number of bureaucratic systems that (at times) may not function optimally for some particular student. If you encounter a problem, please remember to exercise a bit of discretion when dealing with the person who is addressing your problem. It may be a truism, but often he or she is just doing his or her job, and following procedure and policy that he or she is required to follow.

As social media has gained in popularity, it has become a convenient forum for “venting.” You should be mindful that an open (and permanent) record of “venting” anger, frustration, or dissatisfaction creates a record of statements and comments that often have little context. Be mindful that denigrating your classmates, professors, or “your” educational institution also reflects poorly on you. If you consider whether comments or statements about others are inappropriate or “unprofessional,” hold off on sending them out to the world. Try to take the high road and avoid retaliatory comments if someone else engages in such conduct. You cannot control the “unprofessional” behavior of others, but you do have control over your own behavior.

Dishonesty in any form is not acceptable. Once a person has been found to be dishonest, it is almost impossible to rehabilitate his or her reputation.

Law school is an opportunity to build your professional reputation. Take the opportunity to do so.

Faculty Announcements

The American Association of Justice (AAJ), the largest group of trial attorneys in the world, sought out a prominent legal scholar to sort through the recent amendments to The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. We are proud to say that St. Thomas Law Professor Patricia Moore was chosen as the scholar that sorted through the changes and analyzed their soundness and significance in what turned into a 150-page treatise. The AAJ published Professor Moore's, work entitled: "The First Year of the 2015 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: Refinement, Not Revolution." It is available on the AAJ's website to help guide American trial lawyers through the thicket of updated rules.

The ABA conducts reaccreditation reviews of law schools every seven years. A major part of the processes is a formal site inspection performed by representatives of the ABA and their preparation of a site inspection report. Professor Carol Zeiner had the privilege of serving on an ABA Site Inspection Team from March 12 through March 15, 2017, for the reaccreditation of LSU's law school.

On Saturday, March 25, Professor Carol Zeiner will attend a conference for the enhancement of law teaching and learning at Emory University law school.
